

Dr. Priscilla Settee describes the critical state of our water. She goes into detail about specific First Nations and the dire Indigenous water situation. The paper identifies why water is endangered and specifies the role of oil exploration, fracking, and our industrial food system. This paper also describes push back strategies and the important role that non-Indigenous people play in lending solidarity regarding the water crises. Settee relies heavily on Maude Barlow's work and the role of the Council of Canadians research and action organization. (Priscilla.settee@usask.ca)
